

7th February, 1955.

My dear Frank,

I am sending you a typed copy of what I have written for the second chapter, on which I shall very much want your opinion, as indeed I should like to get Barnard's also. It would be nice if you felt sufficiently interested to come and meet some others to discuss the rationale of the kind of formulation that I have here attempted, as it seems as if a number of hairs had to be split, and it is important that people with experimental interests and experience should develop a language precisely fitted to their actual needs. In case you need it for reference, I am enclosing, also, the material of the first chapter.

Sincerely yours,

Encs.
