Dear Fisher

In my address, which I suppose I shall let off in October, I propose to speak of an annual parade of the nation, arranged according to wages, with a post-erected at the middle man.

Then, after pointing to certain possible misunderstandings, I should like to say that I had applied to you - or should you really prefer, to a statistical friend - and am told that the number of men working the line each year would considerably exceed 300,000. I propose to say that Certain doubtful assumptions have to be made in calculating this figure, because of our ignorance — making this a plan for new census figures.

Hence in your letter. Shall I put in the figure based on the letter? That will satisfy me.
Or should you like now to reconsider? Or should you like to know exactly what I am going to say before reconsidering?
I may not get it fully written out till Sept. 1. (when Moore would like to have it to print.) Answer verbally on Friday, if you like
Yours sincerely,
L. Dawkins
