My dear Taylor,

I am glad you have the Bristol material well in view.

Very many thanks for your invitation. I imagine I can get a train reaching Cambridge about tea-time. If not, I will write again. I have received this morning the book of protocols and your own material for entry in the general list, but I have done nothing about it yet.

I think you are right that the variation in blood group percentage in Great Britain, which seems to be simple and important, ought to go in a letter to Nature pending any fuller publication we may attempt later.

Yours sincerely,
